The HyperMotion technology gives players the ability to make on-pitch adjustments, positioning and reactions throughout gameplay. Highlights include: Player movement & reactions: Player movement is based on motion capture data, so the player will feel his own body, with the reaction that his muscles make when he kicks the ball Player reactions to open/attack, counterattack or off-ball movement Positioning: Adjustments in player positioning (e.g. ball speed adjustments) Player anticipation in the right position to receive the ball, or to win and control the ball Real time defense: In a situation where an attacker is quickly climbing the touchline, the defender instinctively moves closer to the attack, and the slower he/she is in that movement, the more the attack will accelerate – the defender will fight off the attacker more Adjustments in the position of the defenders Decision making: Players are able to think and act faster than before, and to make dynamic decisions in mid-flight. The player's CNS will quickly adapt to the newly available information and make fast decisions Players can now attack by anticipating the opponent's movement and if he counteracts, the player can make a smart and confident decision Ambidexterity Football is a game of distances and timing, requiring an array of skills and abilities. Players will now be able to adjust their positioning and actions based on their teammates and the situation on the pitch. When a teammate arrives in an area of cover, the player can try to win the ball or exploit the situation to launch an attack, moving laterally or vertically. New artificial intelligence (AI) tech The FIFA team continues to build on Artificial Intelligence (AI) technology that further intensifies how the AI players behave in gameplay. Players use instinctual reactions and the most appropriate on-pitch technique in response to the situations they face, reacting instinctively to the ball even when some artificial intelligence constraints have been introduced. This includes: Adapting to team mates' actions in the immediate area Adjusting their actions to improve and change the direction of the play, and make smart decisions while the player is moving To complete the package, the developers have also introduced new game engine, new animations, physical models, new ball control, ball physics, ball deceleration and new AI behaviours. Another feature – this time from the Control Point angle
