Its locals come from around the world to shed light on the region's nightmarish ecology. Without the Arctic Circle, the northern polar region would be all but unbearable. The icy belt is where the longest day and shortest night in the Northern Hemisphere overlap. The 50 degrees north latitude roughly divides the Arctic from the Antarctic, and it's home to a number of bizarre species. The Siberian tiger, polar bear, wolverine, and snowy owl have been documented here. But the stories of the most spectacular species inhabit the subarctic zone which lies above the Arctic Circle, often above the Arctic Ocean too. And these creatures can be found in the dark at all hours of the night. So what are the nocturnal hunters of the subarctic doing at this latitude? Are they chasing each other? Are they hunting sea mammals? Or are they protecting the region from human beings? Maybe they're studying nature's unruly dark winds that blow in from Siberia, unleashing their strength and hissing with fury. But before we consider these questions, we'll need to get familiar with the Arctic Circle's residents.
