Field of the Invention The invention relates to a method for controlling the power of a radar sensor arranged in a motor vehicle, having at least one modulated transmitter and one modulated receiver, which evaluate a synchronous reflected signal, having a synchronous signal component, derived from the reflected signal by the modulated receiver and having a time-dependent envelope curve, a threshold value of the envelope curve being compared with a value of the time-dependent envelope curve to form a triggering signal which, in case of a coincidence, initiates the triggering of a control unit or an external control. 2. Description of the Related Art A method of the above type for controlling the power of radar sensors in vehicles is known, for example, from EP 2 075 585 A2. In this case, reflection signals detected by a radar sensor are sampled at the same rate as the transmitting pulses. Each sample is subsequently evaluated and compared with a threshold value, the evaluation being synchronized to the transmitted pulse and the transmitted pulse also being identified as a timed echo. If the echo is identified as a timed echo within the times of evaluation of the threshold value and the transmitted pulse, it is assumed that the reflected signal corresponded to the transmitted pulse. The total power of the transmitted pulses is thereby derived from the evaluation in a suitable manner and is used to control the power of the radar sensor. The patent application publication DE 10 2004 040 451 A1 discloses a method for the automatic power control of a distance measuring device which is

While the orthogonal sequences are suitable for both OFDM and SC-FDMA, typically, the transmitter uses the orthogonal sequences for generating OFDM and the other orthogonal sequences for generating SC-FDMA. For example, a multi-carrier orthogonal frequency-division multiple access (MC-OFDM) system transmits multiple data streams over multiple

We have used electron microscopy to study the asymmetric cell division in human cleavage-stage embryos. We demonstrate that the'medial' and 'lateral' blastomeres share the same nuclear content, chromatin and cytoplasmic membrane. However, the fusome of the 'lateral' blastomere is replaced with a plaque of fibrillar material. In addition, the plaques in the 'lateral' blastomere are part of the metaphase plate of the maternal pronucleus. The division plane in these blastomeres was parallel to the inner-blastocoelic surface of the embryo. The'medial' blastomere in these early stages of development was more irregular than its sister and did not have a clear border between the two blastomeres. We propose a model for human asymmetric cell division during the first few cleavage divisions in which the'medial' and 'lateral' blastomeres are formed from a common precursor cell. The 'lateral' blastomere, lacking a fusome, obtains a variety of polarities as it divides asymmetrically. The 'lateral' blastomere that divides to form the embryo must form a cell that is adjacent to the inside of the embryo. We also postulate that different divisions between the two blastomeres may be related to differences in chromosomal complements between the two blastomeres and an unequal role of the zona pellucida in cleavage-stage human embryos.View This Defending Their Position Against Child Exploitation And Other Crimes In Mexico Human Rights Experts Rally Behind Jails In Mexico The latest offering from acclaimed director Mariana Sota's
