Recently, we demonstrated that c-myc and the c-myc-deltaNp63 complex regulates the expression of the genes in the apoptosis-associated signaling pathway. Current work is focused on three aspects of this signaling pathway: (1) The role of c-Myc in the regulation of Noxa expression was investigated. We found that c-myc specifically binds to the c-Myc-deltaNp63 complex on the Noxa promoter. (2) We showed that deltaNp63 promotes c-myc-induced apoptosis. (3) We showed that Noxa transactivates many anti-apoptosis genes. This finding raises the possibility that Noxa-mediated apoptosis is the default pathway. We are currently investigating the molecular mechanisms of anti-apoptosis and tumor progression by Noxa. To understand the tissue-specific functions of the Noxa-mediated apoptosis pathway, we propose to investigate the molecular mechanisms that regulate Noxa expression. We have shown that deltaNp63 is required for apoptosis. Therefore, we are going to investigate how deltaNp63 regulates Noxa expression. Based on the deltaNp63-c-myc-Noxa-DNA-PK-GADD45 pathway, we also hypothesize that the binding of deltaNp63 to promoter site can activate the transcription of the anti-apoptosis genes by Noxa. The experiments proposed here will significantly advance our understanding of the role of the Noxa-mediated apoptosis pathway in tumor initiation and progression. Our long-term goal is to understand how c-myc and deltaNp63 regulate the expression of the genes in the apoptosis-associated signaling pathway, so that we can selectively destroy tumor cells with minimal effect on normal cells.
